1 ARCHITECTURE AND DESIGN

34 Pagodas, pavilions and contemporary design: MPavilion Rebecca Coates

40 Limitless: Nacho Carbonell
  Anna Cernick

2 POP CULTURE

78 Both and neither: On Matthew Barney, Debbie Harry and the uncanny Ross Simonini

82 Singing from the same song sheet: art and music's fashionable collaborations Alison Kubler

94 Loving the alien: Darius Kasminas and Pankasila
  Chris McAulliffe

104 Oajin Fujita: Street theatre
  Justin Paton

112 Wearing his own crown: The work of Rako Rennie Vincent Alessi

120 The last pop artists: Shaw, Boynes, McLean
  Wayne Tunicliffe

3 THE OCCULUS

130 The mind, like the universe:
  Alejandro Jodorowsky Joel Stern

136 Patricia Piccinini:
  Mysterious matter
  Jacqueline Millner

134 Tony Garrifalakis:
  Hystericl glory
  Macushla Robinson

158 Storm's a c-c-comin' and it's gonna be me: Jason Greig Peter Vangiani

160 Stan Hopewell:
  Seeking transcendence
  Ted Snell

168 Star Gossaga's creative force Nghihiroko Mason

176 Gnostic influx: Jess Johnson decodes demonic data Tessa Laird

4 PROJECT

186 Visible thoughts:
  Laith McGregor Romy Ash

5 ARTIST'S CHOICE

198 Catherine Bell
  Christian Thompson

200 John Webber eX de Medici

202 Ad Reinhardt
  Lindy Lee

204 Augustus Earle
  Bill Henson

206 Grace Crowley Destiny Deacon

6 ARTAND Australia / Credit: Sultana Private Banking Contemporary Art Award Gertrude Contemporary and ARTAND Australia Emerging Writers Program

210 Zoë Croggon
  Aphan Madder

210 Wanda Gillopie
  Julian Murphy

214 Julian Day
  Eleanor Zeichner

216 Abdul-Rahman Abdullah Chloe Mandryk

7 PROJECT

220 Art banquet:
  Li Jin and Joe Furlonger

COVER:
Patricia Piccinini, Metaglue
the Future: radical, 2003 Digital drawing for ARTAND Australia,
dimension variable
Courtesy the artist, Tolarno Galleries, Melbourne, and Rodjen Oskaja Gallery, Sydney

PAGE:
Patricia Piccinini, Metaglue
Drawing on the Saturn, 2003
Digital drawing for ARTAND Australia,
dimension variable
Courtesy the artist, Tolarno Galleries,
Melbourne, and Rodjen Oskaja Gallery, Sydney
GAJIN FUJITA
Drive from east Los Angeles all the way to Venice Beach in the west and you pass not through one city but many. From tough Boyle Heights with its graffiti and murals to the loan shops and tent cities of downtown, from Little Tokyo through plush West Hollywood and on out to the coast, it is a trip that can leave a newcomer feeling both elated and weirdly displaced. No matter how hard you’ve peered at the map, nothing quite prepares you for the city’s sprawling enormity - the sense of multiple worlds arranged, not hierarchically, but in one ever-expanding grid.

In this spread-out city I’ve often relied on artists to supply a sense of place; Ed Ruscha, with his gnomic signs and blank billboards, is the figure who usually comes to mind. But on a recent trip a different LA artist served as my imaginary guide: painter Gajin Fujita. A first generation Japanese American who grew up in the Latino neighbourhood Boyle Heights, Fujita got his artistic start on the streets of Los Angeles as a young graffiti writer. ‘Bombing’ the train yards and underpasses of the city with the Essex and RGB graffiti crews. Some transformative educational encounters see Fujita on the path to painting and the gallery world, as a teenager he would bus for hours each day to reach an arts-magnet high school in west Los Angeles, and later at the University of Nevada in Las Vegas he found a remarkable mentor and ‘sensé’ in the maverick critic Dave Hickey. But to say that Fujita left the street for the gallery isn’t entirely accurate. Rather, he brought it inside with him in a heightened and highly refined form. Sumptuously coloured, staunchly handmade, wiry with tags and ‘wild style’ lettering, Fujita’s early paintings launch you into a city of signs and wonders, a place where different words and traditions vie like tropical plants for a place in the sun.

The most startling element in Fujita’s art, however, came not from the street but from somewhere more domestic. At home in Boyle Heights traditional Japanese culture had always been part of Fujita’s life; he recalls the folk tales of warriors and heroes told by his father, a painter, and the lacquer, armour and other antiquities brought home by his conservator mother. But what spurred Fujita around as a young artist were the shōnen-e or ‘floating world’ woodblock prints of Hokusai, Utamaro and Kuniyoshi, which he encountered through his mother and then at full force in the Tokyo National Museum on a family holiday in the late 1990s. Mace in vast numbers for urban commoners of the prosperous and relatively peaceful Edo period (1815–1888), the prints portray the entertainments and fantasies of Edo (now Tokyo) with never-to-be-surpassed skill and sophistication. Aved especially by the formal audacity and wild imagination of the Meiji period printmaker Tsukkoka Yoshitoshi, Fujita returned to the studio and began to pose a series of time-travelling ‘what ifs’. What if an artist were to slide open a door between pleasure-loving Edo and pleasure-loving Los Angeles? What if the heroes and villains of the kabuki theatre were unleashed in the world of hip-hop and Hollywood? What if the graffiti artists of east LA were transported back to eighteenth-century Japan?

Fujita’s answers to these questions looked traditional enough in their early stages: patiently gilded, multi-panel paintings recalling domestic folding screens or byobu. But those tranquil surfaces soon succumbed to a series of spirited invasions. Treating the paintings less like domestic objects than tracts of urban wall, Fujita invited his fellow graffiti-writers into his studio to creatively vandulate the gilded surface, layering each elegant panel with a kind of outlaw calligraphy. Into these word-storms Fujita then introduced further signs of the local, like smog-filtered sunsets, wave-lapped palm trees or the silhouetted skyscrapers of downtown Los Angeles. And finally he released his old-but-new cast of Edo yōkai characters: lovers, courtesans, actors, oni demons, masked tricksters and fabulously armoured samurai. The art-critical impulse is to look at the paintings and wonder what Fujita means. Is he using the Edo past to comment on the American present, or using the present to revive our sense of the past? But the most striking thing about the paintings is their lack of an obvious moral tone, the way they throw together different times and traditions without telling us how we ought to feel. Casting the rituals and pleasures of present-day LA back into the Edo past, Fujita invites us to see our own time and place as a stage of strange and distant civilisation - a place as alluring and unfamiliar as the world of Edo prints first looked to his own western eyes. ‘The east’, Fujita suggests, is not an exotic elsewhere; it is within and all around us.

Fujita’s wayward traditionalism comes into sharpest focus in his paintings of battles. Southland stand-off, 2013, for example, is based on a nineteenth-century woodblock print of the historic Battle of Okehaazama (1910), and it bristles with details that bring the battle into twenty-first-century Los Angeles, from the area codes on the warriors’ armour (714 for northern Orange County and 213 for downtown LA) to the Los Angeles Police Department with never-to-be-finally by the formal printmaker and began to an artist were to and pleasure-loving the kabuki theatre wood? What if back to eighteenth-original enough in paintings recalling guir surfaces soon among the paintings Fujita invited vandalise a kind of then introduced its, wave-lapped Tow Loa
east of Edo types arguments, masked art-critical at Fujita means.
read present,
? But the most in obvious moral and traditions the rituals and Fujita invites range and distant the world of
and all around us, open focus in example, is the historic details that bring the area
San Diego County Department helicopters or scooters. Sinister stand in a Japanese screen and crack, are not you, rather, is the imagery: between the elegance and age of blood, the furls and fear details (wild pink frozen motion of karate are not warriors prints, popular look closer and is not the right u)

There's a hard unabashed design beginning as a certain of a Homo of reduction and most fashionable and highly reduce abstract painting entertaining rest of 'abstraction' and graffitiists, such as your painting with graffitiists or the impact immediate experiment, aud. And that complete Though he is no
and museum show painting as if he the surface has

OPPOSITE FROM TOP

Fatah match, 2001
Gold and silver leaf, 1, 1 Munich School on wood Courtesy LA Louver, LA © Gajo Fujita

Bure, 2000
Acrylic, 22k and 22k gold leaf, 1, 1, 1 on wood panel, 145 x 195
Courtesy LA Louver, LA
© Gajo Fujita

PAGE 104
Study for Southland 2002
Pencil, spray paint on paper
Courtesy LA Louver, LA
© Gajo Fujita

PAGE 105
Southland study, 2002
Gold leaf on wood, 1, 1, 1, 1
Courtesy LA Louver, LA
© Gajo Fujita

PAGE 106
Southland study, 2002
Gold leaf on wood, 1, 1, 1, 1
Courtesy LA Louver, LA
© Gajo Fujita
helicopters or so-called 'ghetto birds' in the sky behind them – sinister standards for the falcons and cranes that adorn traditional Japanese screens. But these details and codes, though fun to find and crack, are not what make the painting compelling. What holds you, rather, is the stand-off between different kinds and orders of imagery: between hard lines and sprayed ones, action and stillness, elegance and aggression. The painting sweeps the eye along with flourishes of martial detail: swirling tassels, flashing eyes, splashes of blood, the thrust and clatter of weaponry. Yet this action lives within a decorative scheme of remarkable calm and intricacy, from the furls and featherings of the warriors' plaited armour to the floral details (wild pinks, bush clover) patiently stencilled within. The frozen motion of the poses suggests, moreover, that these warriors are not warriors at all, but, rather like the warriors in many ukiyo-e prints, popular kabuki actors; blood may fly in this painting, but look closer and you see that no-one is bleeding. Battle, in the end, is not the right word: call it a choreographed collision.

There's a hand-wrought intensity to paintings like this, an unabashed desire to impress, and it flows, I think, from Fujita’s beginnings as an artist in spaces well outside the art world. Artists certain of a home in the white cube might pursue strategies of reduction and silence, testing painting's perceptual and conceptual limits by paring it back to nearly nothing. Indeed the most fashionable painting of our moment is of a non figurative and highly reduced kind, namely the art fair friendly brand of abstract painting that has been called (and here I rely on a highly entertaining recent take-down by critic Jerry Saltz) 'drop-cloth abstraction' and 'zombie formalism'. But for Fujita and his fellow grafittisti, such strategies were never an option. In a setting where your painting was always under threat of obliteration by rival grafittisti or civic authorities, the aim was to make the maximum impact immediately – to stand out and be heard. Flamboyance, experiment, audacity, daring; these were the qualities desired. And that competitive exuberance fires up everything Fujita makes. Though he is now an LA stalwart with a roster of exhibitions and museum showings to his name, he still approaches each new painting as if he has something to prove, as if every square inch of the surface has to be earned and energised: fought for.

It’s tempting to describe the resulting works as declarations of identity, with Fujita as a cross-cultural researcher patiently synthesising his eastern and western heritage. But that sober description doesn’t do much justice to the unstable beauty of his best paintings, where every pattern and form seems to be on the brink of collapsing over or turning into another: sinuous dragons, shapeshifting clouds, words with minds of their own. Fujita belongs to what is now a distinguished Los Angeles tradition – the tradition of those who, having no 'authentic' tradition to draw on, pull one together from whatever is at hand and modify that mix on the move. With its gold leaf and graffiti, its palm trees and Hokusai waves, its hip-hop samurai and Hollywood geishas, Fujita's Los Angeles is a landscape where everything is displaced and thus equally at home: an impure, faultline-iven, polyglot paradise. Drive 'back east' across Los Angeles with Fujita in your eyes and the city won’t look the same.

OPPOSITE, FROM TOP

Fishmatch, 2006
Gold and silver leaf, acrylic, paint maker, spray paint and Mean Stroke on wood panel, 66 parts, 268.1 x 200 cm overall Courtesy LA Louver, Los Angeles © Gajja Fujita

Bare, 2006
Acrylic, 29k and 24k gold leaf, spray paint and Mean Stroke on wood panel, 189.9 x 189.8 cm
Courtesy LA Louver, Los Angeles © Gajja Fujita

PAGE 154

Study for Southland standoff/Blue Warriors, 2014
Pencil, spray paint on archival paper, 73.7 x 58.4 cm
Courtesy LA Louver, Los Angeles © Gajja Fujita

PAGE 155

Study for Southland standoff/Rico Winter, 2014
Pencil, spray paint on archival paper, 73.7 x 58.4 cm
Courtesy LA Louver, Los Angeles © Gajja Fujita

PAGES 168-9

Southland standoff, 2013
Courtesy LA Louver, Los Angeles © Gajja Fujita