'Star Wars' to Social Critique

Diverse artistic vision shines in 'True Color'

By Bridgette M. Redman
Argonaut Contributing Writer

Gajin Fujita doesn't waste images when he works. From graffiti to classical icons, from "Star Wars" to Tongva tribes, from spray paint to gold leaf, Fujita makes the most of whatever he finds to tell the stories of what he experiences and explores.

In his sixth solo exhibition at Venice's LA Louver, Fujita shares the work he created between 2020 and 2023, capturing the emotional and social upheaval of those years.

The show, "True Colors," runs through Saturday, May 6, and includes a range of paintings and drawings that dip into social critique and portraiture.

Fujita acknowledged that those years were a period of global angst, animosity and anxiety.

"I was just trying to keep a pictorial diary, basically, of what was happening globally and more particularly where I was born and raised here in LA," Fujita said. "I wanted to make an impression of what I saw out there which was some heinous stuff and just outright ridiculous things going on in our country."

One of his early works he dubbed "#WTF" because that's what he was feeling as he watched the news every day and saw the riots in the streets outside his windows.

In that piece, a geisha sits on a graffitied bench snapping a selfie with her sparkly iPhone while a palm tree burns in the background. It was inspired by him watching young people taking selfies with burning police cars during the George Floyd protests. The chaos spilled out into the streets that he walked every day to school.

"I went through the riots in '92, but this was another level," Fujita said. "I was trying to depict and paint what I saw."

Toward the end of 2020, he painted "Burning Down the House," which captures the energy of 2020 in metaphors that include iconography from the 1980s when he was growing up. In it, Earth has been set ablaze and the "Star Wars" Death Star and a fire-breathing Godzilla roam free.

"It's definitely depicting the era of the '80s that I experienced growing up in the city of LA," Fujita said. "People in my generation were going to relate to it immediately and that's what I know. Those films and characters are super iconic, especially in Hollywood."

Another piece, "No Man's LAnd" pays tribute to the Tongva, the Indigenous people native to what is now LA. It introduces themes that are found throughout the body of work developed in this period — themes of location, identity, political injustice and nature versus humans.

Fujita's 2020 work also captures themes of hope and the belief that society will rise from the current chaos into something better. He expressed that in "We Shall Rise" in which red and blue phoenixes dance together, celebrating unity and difference. He continued to use phoenixes in 2021 in the work "Ether," where it flies above the clouds, transcending all the earthly conflicts going on.

In this 2021 painting "Ether," Gajin Fujita searches for hope and strength for his native Los Angeles.

Gajin Fujita explores the history of the Tongva amid present-day LA in "No Man's Land."

Both paintings came out of his desire to show unity during a divisive time. He said they were born out of iconic images from that year that he will never unsee — the killing of George Floyd being one and the other watching the former president walk across the Capitol with a Bible in his hand while there was rioting and pandemonium behind him.

"I don't think I'll ever be able to erase that image," Fujita said. "I felt like, what are we as people in this country? I wanted to paint an image of hope. So, I painted 'We Shall Rise' and it's an image of two phoenixes flying through the heavens.

"I painted that to have a galvanizing message for the people of the United States because we were being mocked and ridiculed by the rest of the world."

The United States wasn't united anymore. The country was divided over masking and civil rights and so many other things. He wanted his art to counter that.

He also longed to call attention to the reality of mental illness, something that so many more people were experiencing during the pandemic. The message is personal as his mother — who encouraged him as an artist and provided a foundation in classical art education for him — was dealing with Alzheimer's, which accelerated during the pandemic.

With his newest painting, "True Colors," Fujita created a portrait of his mother, Chitose Fujita, who is holding a yellow hibiscus flower with a dramatic sunset behind her. Elephants fly in the background, and she wears a green ribbon, both alluding to her fight against the degenerative disease. Fujita calls it a painting of hope as well.

"I want to have people aware that mental health illnesses shouldn't be taken so lightly," Fujita said. "My mom is a strong, iconographic image. Alzheimer's is a debilitating disease. You can't reverse its course. But throughout the pandemic, I've also had close friends from my graffiti crew that have had issues with their mental capacity. They went through PTSD and were diagnosed bipolar and stuff like that. You can't just put it away or sweep it under the rug. You've got to try to face it and tackle it. I realized that you need to exercise your mind as well."

The exhibition also includes his first and only self-portrait and a portrait of legendary LA Dodgers manager Tommy Lasorda.

Along with the show, LA Louver will publish a new catalog of Fujita's work with an introduction by the gallery's founding director, Peter Goulds, and an essay by art critic David Pagel.

Fujita and Goulds' friendship keeps him returning to the LA Louver. He said they immediately developed a great rapport, and he has been pleased with everything he has done there.

The catalog is between 100 and 150 pages, much longer than the last one they did in 2011. There have also been advances in printing technology that show his work in a much better fashion. In addition to depictions of his work, the catalog contains pictures of his outdoor studio and him working in it.

Meanwhile, he's eager for people to see "True Colors" and all the changes it represents in his work.

"It's a body of work that is super personal to me and there's been technical changes," Fujita said. "They'll definitely know it's my work, but there's an evolution involved in my works. These paintings have never been seen even though I made some of them three years ago. They haven't been shown publicly. So, I hope people will enjoy seeing these basically new pieces." ■

LA City breaks ground Ballona Creek Total Maximum Load Project

A particularly wet year has made it all too visible how polluted Ballona Creek is. In a timely fashion, the city broke ground on the latest project funded by the county's Safe Clean Water Program, the Ballona Creek Total Maximum Daily Load (TMDL) Project.

The Safe Clean Water Program aims to modernize the county's water system, protect coastal waters, reduce pollution and create a more equitable water system.

"This Safe Clean Water project is an investment in the future for all Angelenos, including those who live on the Westside," said Councilmember Traci Park. "I commend the work Los Angeles Sanitation and Environment and the other city departments have done to make critical projects like this a priority."

The Ballona Creek TMDL Project will focus primarily on reducing bacterial deposits and improving water quality in Ballona Creek to improve the ecology of the wetlands, enhancing the creek's ecosystem and better public health.

To accomplish those objectives, the city will build two new low-flow treatment facilities throughout the 128-square-mile watershed, one in Culver City and another along the Sepulveda Channel in Council District 11. Combined the two facilities will treat 7.3 million gallons of runoff and dry-weather flow each day. What the new plants cannot treat on-site will be transported to the Hyperion Water Reclamation Plant for reuse and recycling.

"Improving the quality of the Ballona Creek Watershed by removing pollutants will protect both public health and local ecosystem," said Barbara Romero, the LA-SAN director and general manager. "The construction of these two low-flow treatment facilities brings us closer to the ambitious water quality goals set forth by the city."

New Fixtures: The Easy, Affordable Update You're Not Making to Your Bathroom

Every year, the Cost Vs. Value Report from Remodeling magazine lays out an array of remodeling projects and their associated return on investment (ROI). A bathroom remodel always makes the list of popular projects, but the typical cost—more than $20,000 for a midrange remodel and almost $65,000 on the high end—can give homeowners pause. That's why we are always looking for ways to make small changes for big impact in the bathroom. One of our favorites: new fixtures.

"Trading up for a new faucet or showerhead can give a bathroom a whole new luxurious feel and it's one of those cheap bathroom ideas," said Family Handyman. "It's especially fun to update those fixtures that you use every day."

If you have older cabinets and countertops that are in need of updating, you may think a new faucet or bath fixtures won't make a dent. But you may be surprised. "These items may seem insignificant, but updating them can make a big difference in your bathroom's look," said Money Crashers.

These small updates may be enough to make an older bathroom look freshened up, which is important if you're trying to sell your home. But they may also help you enjoy your space more, even if you have no plans of moving anytime soon. "These improvements are affordable, easy, and quick, yet they will give the room a fresh new look," said Termine's Specialty Supply.

Aesthetics are obviously important. But, depending on how old your fixtures are, updating them might also save you money, and improve your footprint. "When you install new plumbing fixtures that are designed for improved efficiency, you can reduce water usage," said Termine's. "This change is not only responsible conservation, but it can also lower your monthly water bill. Saving money and water doesn't have to be complicated or expensive. Replacing an old shower head with a new model designed for lower flow or installing an aerator in your current faucet can make a positive difference."

A word on finishes

If you don't have a personal preference, you might choose a finish for your new sink fixtures to match what's in your bath or shower, assuming you're not changing those as well. Or maybe you're making your decision based on what's on sale. Here are a few things to consider if you're not sure which way to go:

Price—Budget is obviously a driver here, especially if you're looking for an affordable update. Our pro tip is to check with local building supply warehouses, where you can often find overstock and clearance items for a great price. We also recommend signing up for Lowe's and Home Depot's daily emails so you'll be alerted to their Special Buy of the day. Bathroom fixtures are in the regular rotation.

Cleanliness—If you're a neat freak, the fact that shiny chrome fixtures are more likely to show water spots and fingerprints may be a deal breaker. A more matte finish may be a better option.

Trend factor—Matte black is the latest trend when it comes to fixtures, but you'll have to weigh whether you want to go super current and risk your fixtures being out of fashion quickly. The good news is that because this is a relatively inexpensive update, you can always change them out again when another new finish catches your eye!
